

Emily...

On the 25th of March last year I left my family home headed in the direction of Merimbula, a town I have never heard of before applying for a position there 3 weeks earlier. I must say moving to a small town that I had never laid eyes on from my busy city life-style in Adelaide was rather daunting. It barely took a week to know I'd made the right decision. Starting out as a new grad physio at Sapphire Coast has been ideal.

The education we received in the beginning was really beneficial. There is always some one around to ask questions and all of staff are willing to help.

It's now 18 months down the track and we are still having case study sessions to ensure we are travelling well. I know when I compare myself to other friends in the city, working under pressure to build lists and see 20+ patients a day, I'm in the better position and that's before we even consider that I live in a holiday resort 20 metres from the beach!

I may have moved to the slow pace of coastal town but rarely is there a quiet weekend. I regularly speak to my friends back in Adelaide who are interested to hear what adventures I've been up to this weekend.

How many places can you spend one day in the surf and the next day skiing in the mountains?
